Information, Sensation, and Perception Kenneth H. Norwich

Based on two decades of thought and research, this book presents a new fundamental equation termed the "entropy theory of perception" and proceeds to show how nearly all of the empirical laws of sensory science discovered in the last 130 years can be derived from this equation. Through this, the book offers a new theoretical approach to understanding the process of perception, and a new mathematical technique for analyzing sensory data. The book also discusses both machine and human perception, but from the perspective of mathematics/physics rather than from that of a neural network model.
