Everyday we come into contact with countless substances that could be toxic. This applies not only to the obvious candidates such as asbestos, lead, and sulphur dioxide, but also to compounds such as caffeine and headache tablets. A Small Dose of Toxicology explores the subject by placing toxicology in a human context and discusses current toxicology concerns without assuming a prior background in science. Ideal for students requiring a basic foundation in toxicology or public/environmental health, or for anyone who needs a primer to the subject, this engaging and wider-ranging text illustrates important toxicological principles using examples that readers can readily identify with.
